A LITTLE LOVE OF MINE.

- I know a clever little muid
  And sweet, who claims me for her knight,
  And I bonfess I'm half afraid
  She thinks whate for I do le right.
  The reason why I may not tell.
  She's five, while I am twenty-nine,
  And yet we love each other wait.
  I and this little love of mine.
- She bas a stender, liseam form, frown eyes where trust and truth abide. A Cupid's mouth where kines awarm. Rose checks where dimpire deltly hith. A smile she borrowed from the sides in some rare hour of summer time that a sweet or serious, gial or whee. As saits this little love of mine.
- La reine petite, the little queen, Swift to forgive as to command. The deintiest monarch ever seen— She keeps her subjects well in hand, Their happiness her only task. She rules by childhool's right divine, And richer kingdom none may ask Than has this little love of mine.
- The boundary of her empire lies
  In house's fair walls; her wealth untold
  The levelight in her mother's eyes—
  A freesore greater far than gold,
  Ays, running over is her cup
  With love's most rare and costly wine,
  And she—she gayly drinks it up,
  This charming little love of mine.
- Fresh be the draft! I wish the hours
  May bring her what she most may prize.
  Soft dewy dawns, and fragrant flowers.
  And light winds calling to the skies.
  But if my soul might win the bilss
  To beg a boon from Father Time
  Twould be to leave her as she is,
  This dainty little love of mine.

NIPPED IN THE BUD.

When I was a boy, I attended a pub-lic school in a New England town not many miles from the Hub. The teacher of classics in that institution was a man of the name of Virgil Monson, who was by birth and training a Puritan, but one whom culture had somewhat liberalized, though he retained many prejudices of the average Yankee.

In person he was short, heavy and thickset. His head was dome shaped, but it appeared to me that his bumps of on and combativeness had been unduly developed at the expense of the bumps of conjugal affection, which was sufficient explanation of the fact that he had not yet committed matrimony, though he had turned 35 at the time I

Whatever may have been his defects, I must do him the justice to say that his forehead was broad and high, sure sign of intellectuality; his nose of the Roman variety, which always indicates strength of character and tenacity of opinion, while his manner of compressing his lips pointed not the less certainly to his firmness, to which a square chin also contributed.

His disposition was by no means lamblike, nor his temper equable, as his red hair—what there was of it—and red beard bore abundant testimony to the contrary. I grieve to say that much learning had made Mr. Monson not mad, but bald. The dome part of his head was wont to shine like the golden dome of the state capitol in Boston, especially after the vigorous polishings he gave it in his toilet. A fringe of sandy hair surrounded the aforesaid bald surface like the diverging rays of light around the aurora borealis.

Add to the foregoing an excitable temperament, a quick and nervous manner, a love of pedantic display, a fondness for Greek and Latin roots and most of all for natural science, and you have a tolerably fair description of an

After spending an afternoon in the fragrant clusion of the forest he would return with his pockets full of botanical and entomological specimens. Among the last may be mentioned caterpillars, moths, butterflies and other denigens of the woods. His room was next door to mine and had the appearance of a museum. There were numerous books, of course, on all sorts of subjects, ferneries, cabinets of minerals and chloroformed butterflies, suspicious bottles containing queer crea-tures in all stages of alcoholic intoxication and aquaria containing living fish, toads, lizards and so on.

Absorbed as he was in his duties at school, his favorite studies and pursuits, Mr. Monson had had little time to think of matrimony, and though some design-ing mammas had pressed the question ome to him his invariable reply had "I don't need a wife. I am happy enough as I am." This reply served as a wet blanket to the enthusiastic interest his lady acquaintances entertained in his happiness. Though his character and disposition were not such as to make him popular with the fair sex, still the few who knew him respected him, wondered at his prodigious learning, which he took no pains to conceal, and secretly laughed at his eccentricities and hob-

Having evaded Cupid's darts so long and with such signal success, no one supposed for a moment that he would succumb at last to the charms of a coquettish country girl. But so it turned out, thus proving the truth of the old adage that there is no fool like an old fool. He fell a victim to love so late in life that, like mumps and messles, it attacked him with greater virulence than it would have done in his younger days.

The girl, whom we will simply call Lilian, was a brunette of fascinating manners, but rather homely features. But if she satisfied Mr. Monson's notions of an ideal woman no one else had a right to complain. She was still attending school, though past 21 years of age, and as fate would have it was boarding in the same house as the pro-fessor. It was observed by the landlady and her daughter that after Lilian's ad-vent Mr. Monson was changed from his own self. He paid more attention to his tellet than before, brushing his fringe of hair with unusual care and having his beard trimmed oftener than had been his wont. At the table he had alternate fits of abstraction and loquacity.

And when he showed her his various bugs, insects and reptiles, mak-ir g a running commentary on their pe-culiarities, the landlady formed the very natural conclusion that the professor was badly "stuck." The girl was a splendid listener and flattered Mr. Monson's vanity by her attention rather than by words of praise.

and bugs behind." "By this time the caterpillar had reached his bald spot and from that ele-vated perch was looking on the scene with placid enjoyment. He caught my eyes as they were bent toward the intruder, and just then, his excitement having subsided a little and no doubt eeling the nasty thing on top of his head, he caught it in his hand, crushing the poor worm at the same time. Many cases of catarrh might be avoided and others greatly relieved if at the first sign of any trouble in the 'carly sunfiles' period the nose and throat were thoroughly sprayed at least once a day with one part of listerine mixed with two parts of water. A throat spe-cialist thinks this treatment as much a part of the good and cleanly toilet as trushing the teeth or hair or bathing. -New York Post
